

Missing Data Problems in Public Health

Missing data arise commonly in many studies in Public Health and Medicine. Here I will review some cases where statistical methodology has contributed to our ability to overcome limitations in technology and sampling and produce good inferences with imperfect data. We will discuss examples from estimation of radon levels from diffusion battery data, longitudinal cohort studies, and testing for genetic effects with family data.