

Data Complexity, Model Spaces, and Predictions

We define three ways to measure the complexity of data nonparametrically and present computational results to show some of their properties. Then, we use these measures to help guide the choice of model classes and predictors in a series of computed examples. We conclude by discussing the possibility of model list selection by a predictive variance bias tradeoff. This talk is highly exploratory.